

Towards a socially abnormal aperitivo

In this long long "quarantine" (now we're passed the 14 or 40 days) process, my main focus has been on my home, my kids (mainly trying to home school without going too mad), finding ways to sustain Bacal - which has been opened for barely a year - finding ways to sell wines to our clientele and new possible guests who haven't yet been. And listening to music - lots of new music - and more than ever filtering between what is for me and what I really would want to share with the smiley people coming to pay visits at Bacal for a few drinks and complimentary food. It had become a natural second home and my cooking was focused on either my kids and my guests - so now I miss them all and for that, I have made a couple of playlists imagining us all being there...this is the second one which has yet to be published. Enjoy and hope to see you there.
